

Could you achieve business success without being able to communicate effectively?

You've seen the vast potential that outsourcing to Asia and other foreign countries like India holds. And you're eagerly anticipating your success. But have you considered the possibility that communication could be a problem?

Even though you may be speaking the same language, there is still a great margin for error.

Consider this fact:

93% of communication is non-verbal. What this means is that a mere 7% of communication is verbal. In the world of business, getting your message across clearly is of utmost importance. So you must make this 7% count!

Add in the fact that Eastern countries such as India have their own unique and very different cultures. You may think this is not a problem because business is business wherever you go.

But you'd be wrong.

Are you aware of the dangers of ineffective intercultural communication?

I'll give you an example.

I have a friend who was born in Thailand. He's a fun guy, very friendly and helpful, as many Thai people are. He moved over to our country several years ago with his Thai wife. But almost as soon as he began settling in, he realized just how difficult it can be to become familiar with a brand new culture. Driving along quite happily one day, he approached a car waiting to pull out ahead of him. He waved them and carried on.

But the car pulled out and the two drivers were nearly caught in a very serious collision!

You see, in this country, if you wave a person waiting to pull out ahead of you, it means 'go ahead, I'm letting you in'.

But in Thailand, the very same hand signal means 'don't go, I'm carrying on'.

Of course my Thai friend was a little shaken over his encounter. But it could have been a lot worse.

Can you see the obstacle here?

This applies directly to the world of business when culture differences are involved. To assume that cultural differences will have no effect in the business arena, could be fatal. And in the quick-fire world of business, fatal is not something you want in the equation!

You could continue and ‘hope for the best’, cross your fingers and hope they ‘get what you mean’.

But if you have any real desire for business success, ‘hope’ is not something to rely on.

You have to be confident, assertive and absolutely certain of what you want and need.

Of course, you already know that!

But here’s the trick. You also need your outsourcing company to feel confident, assertive and certain about their role. If there is any doubt as to what they need to do, it could have catastrophic effects on your business.

Loss of money, time, investment, energy...
